But one sigh more I'll give thee. But one sigh more I'll give thee, Thou long, long cherished one; No more I now may love thee-The light of hope is gone. I dare not think how fondly My very soul was thine, Nor yet how oft and proudly My heart hath called thee mine!

But fate-dark fate-has severed Hearts that so long were one, And though they thus are blighted, Yet must they still live on. A death-like chill falls o'er me When I think I must forget The love so truly given thee Ah. I must love thee yet!

For how can I forget thee, When in my very heart There dwells so fond and faithfully Thine image as a part? When in its depths there lingers Thy name-thy voice so dear-The thought itself is madness; Still, still thou reignest here.

I know as thou hast loved me Thou can'st not love again; The freshness of thy heart is gone-With me 'twill e'er remain; Thou may'st woo and wed another, But thy heart is all my own, But its first love's mine forever, Though the light of hope is gone!-
